STOCK SPOTLIGHT

Verizon Communications Inc

Verizon Communications Inc. (NYSE: VZ) joined the BUZZ index this month as a rare addition from the telecommunications sector, increasing the sector's weight within the index from 1.0% to 2.3%. In January, VZ gapped down 4.5% amid disappointing earnings, analyst downgrades, and a delay in its takeover of Yahoo! Inc. After drifting lower into February, the stock has since stabilized around $50. The dividend yield, one of the major selling points for telecom stocks, sits at an attractive 4.6%. VZ has been increasing the dividend every year since 2009, and indications from management suggest that this growth will continue to be stable. Recently, the company renewed its expiring buyback program, demonstrating continued confidence in its stock despite the negative news headlines. The noticeable increase that we've seen in investor sentiment over the past month highlights that, contrary to popular belief, shifts in sentiment are not limited to momentum, "fast-money" stocks, but also exist in mature industries with value-oriented characteristics.

Tesla Inc

In September 2016 we highlighted Tesla Inc (NASDAQ: TSLA) as one of the top negatively trending names in the BUZZ index amid a slew of mixed headlines around the company. Two months later, sentiment surrounding TSLA had reversed, along with sentiment towards the tech sector as a whole, as markets began the "Trump Rally" following the elections. TSLA's weight in the index had spiked back to the maximum 3% during the next three months as the stock rallied a whopping 50%. This month, we once again feature TSLA as one of the top sentiment decliners in the index; however, unlike last time, this month TSLA has dropped out of the index completely. News surrounding the company has been abundant, from management departures, to equity and debt offerings, to key Model 3 and Model X updates. Is the latest decrease in investor sentiment another temporary blip or the beginning of an extended downtrend? Time will tell but what is clear is that TSLA is a must-watch stock within the BUZZ universe.
