STOCK SPOTLIGHT

General Electric

After a brutal two years, it appears investors may be throwing in the towel on General Electric (NYSE: GE). A symbol of the U.S. industrial enterprise and one of the original Dow Jones Industrial Index components, the multinational giant has struggled mightily in recent years. GE climbed out of the 2008 recession along with most US equities, recovering from a low of $6 to trade as high as $30 a share by mid-2017. Since then, it has been straight down for the stock, which is now trading below $8 and approaching the lows of the great recession. Down 33% year to date, GE is the worst performing stock in the Dow Jones Industrial Index. The problems over the years have been numerous and complex: failed acquisitions, underperforming management, mismanagement of resources and poor corporate culture have all played a part in GE's decline. Investors had been positive on GE as troubles mounted, viewing the stock as a classic value opportunity. It now appears that they are giving up and that perhaps GE has instead been a classic value-trap. Sentiment declined significantly in November, and for the first time in many months, GE has dropped out of the BUZZ Index.

Under Armour

For years, when it came to sports apparel, most people thought of Nike (NYSE: NKE) or Adidas. Under Armour (NYSE: UA) made a splash in the early 2000's and began making strong impressions within the athletic community. After the 2008 recession, the company experienced tremendous growth, rapidly expanding its base of sponsored athletes and partnerships. Investor optimism was rewarded, as the stock surged to over $50 by December 2015. Since then however, the company has been plagued by waves of negative headlines and volatile earnings. By the end of 2017, UA had dropped back below $20 a share. So far in 2018, the stock appears to have stabilized. On several occasions, we saw investor sentiment increase enough to push UA into the BUZZ Index, albeit at a low weight. This month however, we noticed a meaningful surge in sentiment, making UA the most notable new addition into the Index, suggesting investors may be anticipating a near-term rebound for the company.
